Thank you very much for your help.Q: What do you say when referring to the opposite of a country? For instance, we are speaking of India and Japan, and we don't know whether to say "Japan is not India" or "India is not Japan". Or, the question is not about countries, but about something in a different country: what do you say when you're talking about the opposite of that thing? "A farmer is not a fisherman"? Or "A fisherman is not a farmer"? A: It's complicated. "a farmer is not a fisherman" is a useful way to say something if you're speaking English. However, it is one of the myriad of places where ambiguity creeps in: 1) "is not" and "are not" could be used interchangeably here. However, they do have different shades of meaning. 2) "is" and "are" are not interchangeable when you're using the verb "be" as it normally is used. For example, if you are talking about a farmer "being a fisherman" is correct. However, if you are talking about a fisherman "being a farmer" is technically wrong. 3) "to be" is usually used to describe the relationship between a subject and an attribute. For example, "John is tall" means "John is a tall person". However, "John is tall and 2d92ce491b
